

Plan Garden For New Year

Nothing so detracts from the pleasures of gardening as a haphazard approach to it. And the gardener who fails to realize this will soon an ex-gardener be.

With a planned approach the homeowner can derive full pleasure from his garden. As with the picture on a jigsaw puzzle box, the garden plan presents an ultimate goal, and putting the pieces together is both challenge and fun.

Take pause, then, and give some thought to garden plans. Remember that not only new landscapes need a design, but old ones as well; and while grounds may be completely planted, they are not necessarily offering the fulfillment they could. There is much to be gained from re-designing a poorly planned garden.

Where to begin? Perhaps a landscape designer is the answer. Or, if the gardener is imaginative, he might work out a plan by getting ideas from magazines and applying them to his own needs. More than likely, however, he will do as countless others have, start by consulting a local member of the California Association of Nurserymen, who in the most cases have landscape departments.

With the nurseryman's help, a good plan can be put on paper, and his suggestions for plant material will simplify the task no end. He will suggest which elements of the plan need immediate attention and which others can wait their turn—to be completed.

Before seeking help, measure the dimensions of the lot and put them in their proper proportion on a piece of paper. Then, locate existing structures on this plot—house, garage or shed. Rough in existing walks and the driveway, and—if there is an already established garden—show all planted areas, too. Thus armed, drop in on the C.A.N. Nurseryman and start filling in the blank spaces.

Handy Deck

Many a home owner has had an extra wood deck installed outside his master bedroom to give him a private lounging spot away from the family. Decks built of Douglas fir, spaced for easy water runoff, also can be protected with a solid railing of fir boards for privacy.
