My Aching Head

Practically nobody gets through life without having a headache. In fact, it's been estimated that the average person suffers at least half a dozen headaches a year, severe enough to drive him to the aspirin bottle.

To set nervous fears at rest, less than one-half of one per cent of severe recurring headaches are due to brain tumor. Headache may be a sign of tuberculosis, asthma, chronic bronchitis, heart disease, blood disorders, kidney disease, high blood pressure, eye strain.

Headache can also come from poor ventilation, fever or hunger. By far the most common type of headache is the tension headache, a full, steady pain across the forehead. Pain right on the top of the head can result from a neurotic state.

Sinus infection and noise are both over-rated as headache causes. Sinus infection may account for an occasional headache, but hardly for headaches which recur over a long period of time. And it's so much noise itself which gives you a headache, as your irritation with the noise.

When should you see your doctor about a headache? There's no one answer to that. If you're worried that something might be wrong, by all means go to your doctor, even if the visit merely relieves your anxiety, since that can cause a headache, too. You should also see a doctor if the kind of headaches you get change suddenly, if you have trouble with your vision or hearing as well as a headache, if you have weakness or numbness on one side of your body along with the headache, and if you have any trouble concentrating.
