

See Dick and Jane Stop Running

It was a little premature on my part to be relieved that Dick and Jane no longer appear in the primary school books of Diane and Sharon, who are in the third and second grades respectively. Not that I had anything against Dick and Jane, a couple of squares if I ever saw one, but after listening for 12 years to "Oh, look, see Dick run!" I was hoping to hear my children recite something a little more interesting and different. After all, for all of Dick's running did the authors ever explain why? Could he have been trying to escape a clout from Jane who found out that he had discovered her secret hiding place for M and M chocolate covered candy and had eaten half of it? Why couldn't they have had a few mishaps along the way so that all the members of this family could have something to identify with? But no, clearly Dick and Jane, and little sister, Sally, who lugged a Teddy Bear named "Tim," lived a perfectly serene life with their dog, "Spot," cat, "Puff" and those wonderful, soft-spoken parents. And who wouldn't be, in that household? Did you ever see "Spot" chew up the "Teddy Bear" and scatter the contents all over the living room where it couldn't be picked up with a vacuum cleaner. Did the cat climb the drapes and make shreds of them? Did Dad ever blow his stack because someone in the house (probably an older teen-aged sister, not mentioned in the plot) used his last razor blade to shave her legs? If Dick and Jane ever dripped popsicles on their clothes leaving unremovable stains, you certainly never read about it. Nor did you ever find the mother sweeping beneath their beds and remarking:

"Oh, look, see the 12 pairs of socks, six underpants, the missing shoe and ten comic books." Unfortunately, Dick and Jane's replacements seem to lead just as dull and placid a life as their predecessors. They even have the same nice, routine names — Tom and Betty, Jean and Denny. Which leads me to ask, why don't any of the children in the beginning primers have names like Chester and Agnes, Rupert and Opal, Wilbur and Zelpa? However, I'd be happy to contribute the names of my seven kids, although I fear their conversation would be equally tiresome:

"Look, Diane, Brian is eating your piece of pie," said Sharon.
"You are a rat-fink," said Brian.
"See the rat-fink," said Jan.
