Hubby May Become Office Boy

I finally got around to reading the latest Vance Packard critique of modern society, "The Pyramid Climbers," which delineates, in part, the role wives are supposed to play to help their husbands reach the top of their professions.

I've concluded, sadly, that if everything Mr. Packard writes is true, I've just "helped" my husband become an applicant for the next office boy vacancy.

For I've been making some of the same mistakes Mr. Packard writes about in his first book, "The Status Seekers"—I'm always a status symbol or two behind the times. For instance, I thought it would be the "IN" thing for us to spend a vacation at Squaw Valley. But now I realize, NOT in August.

Then, too, when everybody else was entertaining at barbecues, to quote Mr. Packard, "Upper class people prefer relaxed informality," we were eating inside off tablecloths. But as soon as we bought an $8.95 portable barbecue, two bottles of hickory-flavored sauce and an apron for my husband, emblazoned with "Come and Get It," everybody in the chic set returned inside. "Elegance returns!" advised the women's magazines.

The chapter in "The Pyramid Climbers" which upsets me most, however, is the one "The Wife—Distraction, Detraction or Asset?" Particularly, the part which reveals that many employers pay visits to the home of their hirelings to find out, "Is this home a peaceful haven where the husband can lick his wounds and recharge his psychic battery?" I'm afraid the only "psy." that of my husband's after "chic battery" which would spending an evening at this need recharging would be house.
