

Coffee Break

By Adeline Daley

I've got to stop reading those articles which have fetching titles like, "Short-Cuts to Happy Homemaking" and "101 Kitchen Wife-savers" before I get more behind in my housework than I am now. (At last count, I figured that I'm about six months behind schedule, not including the ironing.)

What I'm looking for are a few articles entitled, "What's Wrong with a Tattle-Tale Gray Wash? And, "Simplify Your Spring Cleaning — Move." Plus such relaxing advice as, "Let Sleeping Stains Lie."

Isn't that I don't welcome most time-saving ideas, but why did I have to find out that the best way to make yellowed piano keys turn white again is to wash them in a solution of alcohol? Before reading this, I was reconciled to living with a piano whose keys were no longer ivory-colored, figuring that our upright would never see a concert stage anyway.

Yet, after adding this chore to my long list of other household duties, I then had to discover that there IS a way to remove soot from the fireplace. Even 999 layers which have been accumulating for the past ten years. To clean the interior (I hope you have your pencils ready), wipe off the excess soot with a mixture of three parts of water to one part of vinegar, depending on how dry... or is that a recipe for something else?

Of course, the book doesn't add that when you're through you look as grimy as one of the chimney sweeps in "Mary Poppins."

And call me ungrateful, but I was content in NOT knowing that the proper way to restore a brass lamp to its original finish is by rubbing half a lemon with salt over the surface. Oh, I could go on and on. For instance, how will I find time to make the beds when I'm still applying a coat of lard to remove mustard stains from last night's tablecloth?

For a time I thought I could avoid these "kitchen short-cuts" by simply not buying the commercial products which allegedly restore the luster to everything from blackened andirons to tarnished picture frames, but as you notice, the manuals suggest using staples found on most household shelves, such as, soda, salt, lemon juice, and vinegar. In fact, so much in the latter case that if you're not careful, your home will take on the aroma of a pickle factory.

However, I'm not the only member of the family who isn't thrilled by handy household hints. Just yesterday I told my husband that a "coating of wax applied to shovels and other garden equipment prevents clods of dirt from sticking."

Do you know that he didn't even thank me?

"Show Biz" Theme For Eta Kappas

"Lights, Camera, Action," with their members as stars, is the theme chosen by the Eta Kappa Chapter of the Epsilon Sigma Alpha sorority for their 1966-67 program.

First educational program, "Reviewing the Script" was held at the home of Mrs. James O'Donnell in Torrance. Mrs. Pearl Gardner, mother in a foster home, was the guest speaker for the evening.

The Lomita home of Mrs. Ralph Engstrom was the scene of the "Briefing the Cast" business meeting. Another education program was called "On Location" and was conducted by Mrs. O'Donnell.

Continuing the rush season, the chapter will hold a social meeting "Lights," a family picnic on Aug. 28 at Torrance Park.
