

Five Doctors Guard Health of Employees

Five doctors have their offices on the second floor of 740 S. Olive St. in downtown Los Angeles. They see 13,000 patients each year, some of whom come from as far away as San Pedro.

Their patient roster contains the names of nearly 25,000 persons.

Yet there is not even a single outside their office door.

The five are industrial doctors, responsible for overseeing the health of the multi-thousand employees of Pacific Telephone who work in the company's central Los Angeles area.

"OUR ABILITY to provide fast, efficient telephone service is dependent upon the health of our employees," said Pacific Telephone's vice president and general manager, James E. Kenney. "Without a healthy workforce, all our efforts would be crippled."

Heading the 38-man medical department charged with overseeing the health of Pacific's employees is Dr. Edward J. Zaik, the department's medical director.

"There's more emotional and psychological tension in the world than ever before because of increasing stress-

Dr. Zaik emphasizes that supervisors have not only the prerogative but the responsibility to catch health problems among their people and refer them for medical advice.

Zaik's industrial medical department takes on special projects such as the tetanus inoculation program which has been in operation for eight years.

IT CERTIFIES the health status of new employees and reviews the records of disabled employees to be sure they're getting adequate medical attention. On their return to work, some disabled employees are evaluated to see that their assignment doesn't aggravate their health problem, or that they don't present a hazard to co-workers.

It provides prompt and complete treatment of diseases and injuries arising from work and cooperates in developing measures to prevent them.

"We have many advanced diagnostic tools and effective drugs available for prevention, early detection and early treatment of problems," Dr. Zaik said. "But it's up to the individual to take advantage of them."

Employees, including approximately 1,000 who work in Hollywood, can request an examination or consultation about any health problem. Employees with non-industrial health problems are referred to their own physician for medical study, treatment, and follow-up care.
